Due to the uncertainties of the Covid-19 situation, the consequent difficulties in planning travels and organisation, and in line with the health protocols adopted by the University of Udine, the scientific and steering committees decided, jointly with the speakers, to move the part of the XXII FilmForum edition online. While the conference will take place in this form, between November 2nd and 4th 2020 the MAGIS Spring School will postpone its workshop sessions until next year, in March 2021. In its stead, a series of weekly online workshop, between November 10th and December 1st, will be devoted to dissect and analyse how the “Covid-19 Paradigm” affected scholarly research, teaching, cultural events and institutions. The screenings will be still held in presence, in Gorizia, in November, with the aim of supporting Italian and European independent productions and distributions as well as local network and enterprises active in film and media culture. Update and news will be available on www.filmforumfestival.it and will be announced through mailing lists and social media accounts.

Tuning Instructions

On Air:
on-line events that will be accessible only in real time via Zoom at the appointed time and channel

Record:
pre-recorded talks that will be accessible on the website ff2020.filmforumfestival.it one week before the conference and re-played via Zoom at the appointed time and channel.

Live:
the event will take place only in presence, at the appointed time.

The Limina Film Studies Book Award will be streamed via Zoom on the Consulta Universitaria del Cinema (CUC) ‘Montag CUC’ channel

Access and Registration
Both the passwords to access the pre-recorded talks available on the website and the links to attend the streaming via Zoom on Channel 1 and Channel 2 will be provided via e-mail to the registered attendees.

More than twenty years have passed since Rick Altman famously proclaimed sound studies “a field whose time has come” (1999), magnifying a then growing body in film scholarship: the research interests he and his colleagues have systematically pursued since the early 1980s, at the Iowa University. Altman’s statement helped in unravelling an interdisciplinary undercurrent in American, European and non-English speaking film scholarship – Michel Chion’s widely influential works were published approximately at the same time.

As Michele Hilmes later stated, the sound has been an “always emerging and never emerged” area of interest, “doomed to a position on the margins of the various fields of scholarship, whispering unobtrusively in the background while the main action occurs elsewhere” (Hilmes 2005: 249). Nevertheless, Sound Studies have progressively become an internationally recognised (and sometimes criticised: Feld 2015) interdisciplinary tendency since the early 2000s, redeeming aurality from its ever-marginal position and foregrounding it as an area of inquiry in its own right.

Whereas this renewed interest did encourage explorations on previously neglected aspects of film and videosound (Birtwistle 2010; Rogers 2014; Iannotta 2018), scholars interested in aurality only occasionally dwelt on cinema and visual media: however, they contributed to fresh perspectives and angles. Think at the researches on acoustic architecture of movie theatres and film studios (Thompson 2002; Meandri 2016) or at the studies on the relation between artfilm and urban spaces and media/soundscapes (Birdsall 2012), or on other sonic artistic expressions (Halliday 2013).

This year the FilmForum conference aims at enhancing the emergence and consolidation of these aurally oriented perspectives, as innovative entry points in film and media theory and history at large.

As Jonathan Sterne has argued, to think sonically does not so much imply sound as an exclusive object of interest. Instead, it outlines an alternative path to be pursued through history, a different mapping of the same territory, a distinct epistemological position (Sterne 2003; 2012). Following this approach, we are not interested in exploring the aural “segment” of audiovisual texts (i.e. the soundtrack) for their expressive and artistic significance. Neither we are exclusively concerned with “audio” and technologically mediated sound in itself. Instead, our general objective is to understand how the theoretical concepts and methods developed to investigate aurality could reframe cinema and visual media as research objects.
Moving from these general premises, we will primarily focus on the following areas of interest:

Aural epistemologies and metaphors of the audition. Albeit mostly visually biased, film and media theory has always made use of sonically inspired terms and concepts far beyond their literal meaning. Words such as “noise” or “voice” may indicate an unwanted element of communication and a marker and signifier of social identities and gender differences, respectively. The concept of “rhythm” served as a modernist notion to interpret the changes in the interfaces between the organic and the machinic and with the temporal dimension of cinematography itself (Cowan 2012). However, recent studies proposed equally aurally and temporally inspired neologisms to address the technological specificities of contemporary digital media – e.g. Ernst’s “sonicity” (2016). Such extensive use of the aural vocabulary raises questions about the metaphor of listening as a “constitutive feature of epistemology” (Sterne 2012). How did aural figures such as “soundscape” (Schafer 1977), “secondary orality” (Ong 1989), or “acousmatic” (Schaeffer 1952; Kane 2016) contribute to shaping our understanding of the overall media experience? Can these terms be critically scrutinised or reassessed as tools for media and film analysis?

Cinema and media in/and listening culture. The notion of “auditory/listening culture” is one of the key concepts introduced by Sound Studies. Traditionally described as a purely affective and eternally archaic sense (Adorno & Eisler 1947), the hearing has been recently re-assessed as the result of historical, social and cultural construction. Its characteristics may significantly be varying. It depends on the “network of practices that communities of listeners participate in when they hear relevant features of the auditory world, communicate them to others, and pass them on through training” (Kane 2017). To offer but an example, the shift from “silent” film to synchronised sound certainly changed what we expected to hear in a movie theatre, but also our set of practices and routines as spectators. Professionals in the film industry were suddenly required to become acquainted with new audile techniques as “technical skills which can be developed and used toward instrumental ends” (Sterne 2003). We can argue the same for other stages and aspects of film and media history. How did cinema and visual media emerge from or react to a given aural culture, and how did they contribute to shaping it? To which extent the modern and contemporary spectatorship interweave the formation of the modern and contemporary listener? Does film culture contribute to cultivating our listening practices as well? Which sonic skills can be considered representative of the modern and contemporary media culture?

Sound archives and archaeology. Retrieving the sounds of the past is an ever-challenging task which confronts scholars and historians with a wide array of sources. As already stressed (Birdsall 2015, 2017; Birdsall & Tkackzyk 2019), a close dialogue with the established field of Film Preservation Studies would help in promoting sound archives as a distinct object of study. It could foster a systematic reflection on the preservation methods, institutions and infrastructures and on the formal practices of restoration, exhibition and creative re-use of sonic materials. And still, however important, sound recordings alone may suffice to fully reconstruct historical soundscape and significance for the cultures of the past. Can nonsounding written and/or material records (e.g. scripts, physical places, architectural designs) enrich our knowledge on the aural dimension of cinema and media? Can the research and excavation methods developed in sound and music archaeology (see Smith 1999) be fruitfully applied also in film and media history?

We encourage contributions addressing any of these areas or the interrelationships occurring between them.
The Covid-19 crisis has represented a turning point for the contemporary media ecologies and for the ways in which they are investigated. For these reasons and for the huge impact that this crisis has on events such as FilmForum, we decided to devote the XVIII edition of our Spring School to the major issues concerning our current situation. We have planned a completely different set: workshops and paper presentations will be replaced by online lectures to be held throughout November and the beginnings of December on Zoom. Each lecture will refer to a specific section (Cinema and Contemporary Arts, The Film and Media Heritage, Media Archaeology, Porn Studies, and Post-Cinema), focusing on several topics: the role of visual arts during the pandemic; how to teach film and media history in a period of quarantines and lockdowns, when face-to-face classes are confronted with impossible tasks; media activism, media archives, and their relationship with the pandemic condition; porn production and consumption; the new forms of media virality and contagion in the post-cinematic environment.

Cinema and Contemporary Arts – Moving-Image Based Art Strategies Within a Pandemic Media Environment
This year, the section Cinema and Contemporary Arts explores the relation between moving-image based art strategies and media ecologies, focusing on the notion of ecology as a mode of intersectionality developed by T. J. Demos – Professor of Visual Culture and Director of Center for Creative Ecologies at the University of California, Santa Cruz as a methodological framework to address issues of environmental violence and justice.

The Film and Media Heritage – Times of Distance. Researching and Transmitting Film and Media History under/against Covid-19
The recent shift from studying and teaching to online procedures under the influence of the Corona crisis presented all participants with a variety of challenges. What began in the spring of 2020 as real experiments at universities and schools around the world occupies the newly created free space of the social state of emergency with processes of hardware, software and platforms. This change continues to this day: as a multitude of interface processes and effects. Observing and discussing them poses a challenge of its own. Under this main umbrella, the Film and Media Heritage section, during a one-day workshop, would like to stress some issues and topics related the modalities of production and transmission historical knowledge at the time of distance. Every form of historical research and historiography has always meant to deal with several and contradictory temporaliies and distances (Ginzburg); with temporal and spatial vectors and carriers in terms of separation and gaps from the historical phenomenons investigated; with stratifications and grammaticizations of the documentary traces on which the historical research is based (Derrida, Foucault), and finally with technologies and interfaces which mediate the relationship between the historian and the scientific and cultural dissemination of historical knowledge (Chun, Winthrop-Young).

During the Workshop, the organizers would like to discuss and develop further the above mentioned main ideas along three directions: a) archives/festival: the relationships, engagement rules and practices established and developed between film archives and festivals (film history and film heritage-centered) according to the Covid-19 paradigm; b) digital interfaces: the programmatic conditions (i.e. based on programmability and realizing programs), materialities, and effects of moving teaching and learning to online procedures; c) heritage education: how to deal with the concept of materiality and to tackle with the archival practices in a training and teaching context when the social distancing prevent any experimental, hands-on approach to the archival artefacts? Could the historical, metaphorical and operational concept of “distance” highlight and reveal some limits and fallacies behind the current approaches to the representations and histories of film and media materialities?

More specifically, the workshop will offer some short presentations opened to the general discussion among students and all the participants (scholars, curators, archivists, etc.). The three axes will be discussed starting from three intertwined scientific and cultural contributions, followed by Q&A and enhanced participants’ inputs.

Media Archaeology – Pandemic Media Literacy: Notes on Digital and Archival Activism
For this edition, the activities of the media archaeology section will revolve around the impact of the Covid-19 crisis on activism and radical medical ecologies (Goddard). More specifically our primary focus will be the interrelationships between digital (Lieuvrow, Pickard) and archival activism (Flinn) regarding the COVID pandemic.
In fact, although we experienced several limitations in our social lives during the last months, making us feel like our existence was frozen, many social struggles had been fought or arose for the first time. One way or the other, these struggles took place in a highly mediated environment: digital media became crucial to organize strikes, providing essential information to those who were marching in the streets. At the same time, the digital environment presented itself as a place populated by fake news and media manipulations.

In the Media Archaeology section of the school, thus, we will investigate this double edge, comparing new practices of media contention to old ones – for instance, the use of video technologies between the Eighties and the Nineties (see...
Alexandra Juhasz’s works – Juhasz will be giving a keynote speech on November 24th) – and focusing on those new archives that have been created during the activities of digital activism. We will try to pinpoint elements of innovation and consistency, and, drawing on them, to highlight the role of media technologies in our social and political lives.

Post-Cinema – Vulnerable Media and Mediated Intimacies in Times of Global Pandemic

In line with Postcinema attention to media cultures around and beyond film, – including digital media, transmedia ecosystem, interactive technologies, post-humanism and participatory practices – this section will focus on the topic of “vulnerable media.” This conceptual framework wants to explore how current and emergent media technologies negotiate affects between users and digital interactive interfaces. Reflecting on the dramatic events from this year, the section will host a keynote by Aubrey Anable titled “Play During a Pandemic.” She is Associate Professor of Film Studies at Carleton University in Ottawa, Canada and the author of Playing with Feelings: Video Games and Affect (University of Minnesota Press, 2018) which was awarded the 2019 “Best First Book” prize by the Society for Cinema and Media Studies (SCMS).

Porn Studies – “At Home with Pornography”: Cultural Implications of the Pandemic on Pornographic Production and Consumption

Due to the COVID19 pandemic and its effects on the very notions of proximity and intimacy, the adult industry is facing new and increasingly tough challenges, being forced to a radical reconfiguration of its modes of production and to a profound reconceptualization of pornographic labor. In order to discuss the ways in which the current situation is affecting the world of adult entertainment and the lives of the people involved in it, the section will host a keynote by Lynn Comella, titled “Pandemic Porn Cultures: Reflections on Labor, Resistance, and Media Making in Uncertain Times”. Lynn Comella is an associate professor of gender and sexuality studies in the department of interdisciplinary, gender, and ethnic studies at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas. An expert on sexual economies and the adult entertainment industry, her research is animated by a desire to better understand a number of broad sociological themes, including the relationship between gender, sexual politics, marketplace culture, and consumer capitalism. She is the author of Vibrator Nation: How Feminist Sex-Toy Stores Changed the Business of Pleasure (Duke University Press, 2017) and co-editor of New Views on Pornography: Sexuality, Politics, and the Law (Praeger, 2015). She is co-chair of the Society for Cinema and Media Studies Adult Film History Scholarly Interest Group and a regular contributor to Forbes, where she covers the business of sex.
